As of this week, the firm will be led by former Arcadis employee, Richard Hoare. He takes up the reins following the departure of Stuart Yeatman, who led the company through its rebrand from HCP to Vercity in 2021.

Hoare spent the past five years as Arcadis' rail division managing director, and has over 30 years' experience working with organisations developing, constructing, financing and operating major built assets, including as a director in PwC's capital projects and infrastructure practice.

“Richard has in-depth understanding across a range of areas including asset-owners, contractors, and project delivery organisations, as well as blue chip advisory firms,” the company said. “We look forward to Richard leading Vercity into the next exciting chapter in our history.”
